ABSTRACT

This directory is designed to help women find information on organizations in cities and towns across the United States which exist to provide help for women with problems ranging from unemployment and lack of recognized job skills to physical abuse and unwanted pregnancy. It is arranged alphabetically by state. Within each state, the entries are organized by the following categories: battered women and rape victim services, career counseling services, displaced homemaker programs, planned parenthood clinics, skilled trades training centers, women's centers, women's commissions, and women's health centers. Complete address and telephone numbers are provided for each organization. The directory concludes with a discussion of sources of further information. (RM)

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people contributed their time and expertise generously during the compilation of this directory. We are grateful to Sandra Burton of the Displaced Homemakers Network, Carol Durst of the New York State Displaced Homemaker Program, Rosemary Goldford of Non-Traditional Employment for Women, Gwen Leen of Catalyst, and Judy Norsigian of the Boston Women's Health Book Collective for providing up-to-date listings in their respective fields. Joni Miller typed through the night in an unheated apartment to complete the final manuscript in record time. The creativity and skill of Susan Trowbridge transformed an unwieldy manuscript into a concise resource book and provided an inspired cover design that conveys the sense and substance of Women Helping Women.

We are grateful for the continued support of Jean Stefanik and the Exxon Corporation and thank them for the funds and encouragement that made publication of this book possible.

Above all, it must be acknowledged that this directory documents the energy and commitment of thousands of women across the country who work tirelessly—often under difficult circumstances and with sparse resources—to provide the vital services and support for women that is much needed and long overdue in this society.

ABOUT THE WOMEN'S ACTION ALLIANCE

The Women's Action Alliance, Inc., founded in 1971, is a national center on women's issues and programs. Firmly committed to full equality for all persons, the Alliance develops, coordinates, and administers programs to achieve this goal. In addition to sponsoring the Women's Centers Project and the Non-Sexist Child Development Project, the Alliance provides a comprehensive Information Services program on women's issues and services that is central to the Alliance's activities.

Other publications of the Women's Action Alliance include the Women's Action Almanac, a complete resource guide to women's issues and organizations; Getting Your Share: An Introduction to Fundraising; Multi-Service Women's Centers in New England: An Annotated Directory; Multi-Service Women's Centers in the Mid-Atlantic Region: An Annotated Directory. Materials on non-sexist early education include Equal Play, a quarterly resource magazine for adults who are guiding young children beyond stereotypes, and a model curriculum, filmstrip, photographs, and toys developed and distributed by the Alliance.

More information on the publications and programs of the Women's Action Alliance and a descriptive brochure of products can be obtained by writing the Alliance.

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Basic Organization

- Women Helping Women is organized alphabetically by state.
- Within each state, the entries are organized by category of service. There are a total of eight categories, although not every state has listings for all eight services. The categories, which are arranged alphabetically, include: Battered Women and Rape Victim Services, Career Counseling Services, Displaced Homemaker Programs, Planned Parenthood Clinics, Skilled Trades Training Centers, Women's Centers, Women's Commissions, and Women's Health Centers.
- Within each category, the services are listed alphabetically by the name of the city in which they are located; city names are in bold face for quick reference.
- Within each city, the services are listed alphabetically by name.
- An "S" after the name indicates that the service has a shelter or safe-home network for battered women.

Categorization of Multi-Service Organizations

If services offered by a single agency fall into two or more categories, the following guidelines apply:

- Women's centers, most of which offer services in several categories, are listed only under "Women's Centers."
- Career counseling centers that also offer displaced homemaker programs or skilled trades training programs are listed only under "Career Counseling Services."

Example

To find a battered women's program in Seattle, follow these steps:

- Locate Washington alphabetically.
- Look under "Battered Women and Rape Victim Services."
- Find Seattle alphabetically by scanning the bold type cities. In Seattle, five organizations are listed alphabetically by title. Three of the five organizations have names indicating that they serve battered women; two of these have an "S" after their names, indicating that they provide shelter.
- Also look for "Women's Centers" in Washington. Here you will find five centers in Seattle which may also offer services to battered women; one is marked with an "S," indicating that it offers shelter.

If the directory does not list the specific program you are seeking or a women's center in your area, turn to pages 175–179 for guidance.

INTRODUCTION

In cities and towns across the country, thousands of women's organizations exist to provide help for women with problems ranging from unemployment and lack of recognized job skills to physical abuse and unwanted pregnancy. Despite the number and diversity of women's services available, finding the appropriate group can be a frustrating experience for the woman in need or for those trying to help her. Because local women's services are often small, new, and nontraditional, they are not listed in standard social service directories. They usually don't have the funds to advertise their services and may not be included in the files of community information and referral agencies. Locating these services can be extremely difficult. Women Helping Women was compiled to address this problem and to make these services visible. Librarians, social service professionals, social workers, counselors, women's organization staff, and individual women should all find the information they need in these pages.

The services included in this directory are provided by women for women to meet women's needs. The degree to which any service can be described as feminist will, of course, vary from center to center, but as a group, all of these services share certain characteristics. All of them owe their existence to the larger women's movement. During the past ten years, feminists have not only articulated issues of importance, they have gone on to build organizations that deal directly with the problems they have uncovered. Feminists have built an alternative, nonsexist, social service network to help women solve the problems they face everyday.*

Another common characteristic is the set of assumptions—usually not shared by traditional helping organizations—that underlies the work of alternative women's services. Simply stated, the most fundamental of these assumptions is that "the personal is the political." All of the services listed here base their programs and methods on the belief that women's problems do not originate with the woman herself but are the result of a society that is essentially sexist. Feminist service workers do not ask the battered woman what she did to provoke the abuse, nor do they ask the rape victim why she was walking alone late at night. Instead, they attempt to show her the larger social picture and to help her gain a better perspective on her situation, while offering her the counseling or assistance that she needs.

*This network has been recognized by the social work profession, see Alternative Social Services for Women edited by Naomi Gottlieb (Columbia University Press, 1980).

Because women's services place great importance on the uniqueness and value of women's shared experience, the role of the peer is crucial to their work. Usually, staff members have experienced the same situations or crises as the clients. Women begin to make new lives for themselves by working with others who have already conquered the problems they face. Consciousness-raising and support groups are also an integral part of the program.

Finally, unlike many traditionally trained professionals, feminist service providers work to free women from prescribed roles and to help them take control of their lives.

The services listed in Women Helping Women were located through a variety of sources, including national associations, national directories and newsletters dealing with specific issues, community directories and newspapers, and the Women's Action Alliance's organization files. As a national center on women's issues and programs, the Alliance has been researching and compiling information on women's organizations and services for the past ten years.

Women Helping Women includes 690 battered women and rape victim services, 179 career counseling centers, 199 displaced homemaker programs, 226 Planned Parenthood clinics, 33 skilled trades training centers, 568 women's centers, 150 women's commissions, and 89 women's health services—a total of 2,134 organizations. There are services in all fifty states and the District of Columbia.

Although every effort has been made to insure that the listings are correct, errors are bound to occur in a project of this magnitude. Furthermore, alternative services have precarious existences: new ones are always being formed in response to new needs, and existing ones are often forced to close their doors. We hope the user will bear with the inevitable inaccuracies and will use the final section, "Sources of Further Information," for additional assistance. Women Helping Women will be updated periodically, so please use the questionnaire on page 182 to inform the Alliance of services that have moved, closed, or opened.

PROGRAM DESCRIPTIONS

The entries in Women Helping Women have not been annotated individually. Because each of the eight categories of service show basic uniformity of program from center to center, regardless of location, individual descriptions are not necessary. Instead, full program descriptions for each category of service are provided here. It is always a good idea, however, to call the center in your city to get specific program information.

Battered Women and Rape Victim Services

Because battering and rape are both crimes of violence, the victims require similar support services and assistance. Thus, many organizations provide both services in one center; others choose to focus on either battering or rape. Sometimes organizations that start out serving one type of victim later expand to include the other. Because of such changes in program, a center's name does not necessarily reflect the range of services offered. For ease in compilation, and to anticipate future changes, all rape and battering services have been listed under one category in this directory. Services offered by multi-service women's centers have not been listed under "Battered Women and Rape Victims Services," so always call the local women's center if you cannot find a program listed in your area.

The services included in Women Helping Women are staffed and directed by women, either independently or in cooperation with another women's organization. The only exceptions are shelters sponsored by community service or mental health agencies. All services that have shelters or safe-home networks are indicated by an "S" after the program title.

Rape Crisis Centers. It is often said that rape victims are raped twice: first by the rapist and then by the system that responds to the crime. That system includes the hospital, the police, and the courts. Sometimes even the victim's family and friends blame her for the rape. Rape crisis centers emerged in the early 1970's to provide free support and assistance to victims who choose to go through the system and to those who want an alternative to it. These centers serve adult victims of rape, attempted rape, and sexual abuse; many help children and incest victims.

Although some services are provided by trained volunteers who offer counseling and other programs from their homes, rape crisis counseling is more often provided from the center's office. Some centers have paid staff members, but virtually all rely on volunteer workers, often as many as thirty to forty. Volunteers are always trained and supervised by the full-time staff or outside professionals.

The first contact a woman has with a rape crisis center is through the hotline. Rape hotlines are usually staffed twenty-four hours a day, either at the center or through an answering service which refers callers to the counselor on duty. Hotline callers are free to remain anonymous, and all information given by the victim is kept confidential. Rape counselors, who often have been rape victims themselves, are trained in crisis intervention and listening skills. Depending on the victim's needs, the counselor may provide basic information, crisis counseling for immediate emotional distress, counseling concerning a past rape, help in deciding whether to get medical care or to report the rape to the police, or referrals to other services. Some centers urge women to report the rape to the police, a few discourage reporting, but all will support whatever decision the woman makes: the choice is always hers.

For women who do not want to report the rape, many centers offer what is called "third-party reporting." The center staff gathers all the information normally compiled by the police, allowing local law enforcement agencies to gain information about the rapist—especially important if he is a repeat offender—and to learn more about rape incidence and patterns. Because hospitals are required to report rapes to the police, the center can refer the rape victim who wishes to remain anonymous to a private doctor.

Center staff will either arrange transportation for the hospital-bound victim or will meet her there. The staff member will explain the examination procedures and will stay during the medical exam, if the woman wishes. If the woman decides to report the rape, the staff member will also accompany her to the police, explain the inquiry process, and remain with her to help insure that only relevant questions are asked and proper procedures followed. Afterward, the center can help with any immediate needs, such as transportation, a change of clothing, emergency housing, or child care.

If the rapist is arrested and the victim decides to prosecute, an advocate from the center may accompany her to the authorities and attend the trial. Again, the staff member will try to assure that the judge and prosecutor comply with correct procedure. The center has lawyers on call who can answer any questions about the court process.

After the immediate trauma is over, the woman may still need counseling to reconcile her feelings about the rape. Counseling may be provided by the hotline, by one-to-one sessions with a rape counselor, or by discussion groups with other rape victims. If the woman needs long-term therapy, the center can refer her to qualified therapists. The center may also offer group counseling for husbands or lovers and for family members.

Battered Women's Services. Violence against women in the home is a pervasive social problem that traditionally has been ignored, if not accepted. It is only in the past ten years that domestic violence has come to be viewed as a crime and that services have been provided to meet the special needs of the victim.

There are two kinds of services to battered women: those that offer counseling and victim advocacy by phone or in the office, and those that provide temporary shelter as well. Organizations without shelters sometimes have safe-home networks, in which volunteers house battered women in their homes on an emergency basis.

Any woman who is a victim of physical abuse or who is threatened with abuse by her husband or lover is eligible for the services of a battered women's center. Many centers recognize that women may also be abused by brothers, sons, or other household members, and offer services to these women as well. Some centers also help victims of emotional abuse, although women in physical danger would naturally be given priority in receiving services such as shelter. Shelters usually require that residents be at least eighteen to twenty-one years of age.

All services for battered women begin with the hotline, which is usually staffed around the clock. When the battered woman calls, a trained volunteer or professional will provide information, referrals, and counseling and will outline possible courses of action. The staff member may set up an appointment for the woman to come to the center for further counseling, or arrangements may be made for her to come to the shelter if there is one. If the center cannot offer shelter, the counselor will suggest other possibilities for emergency housing.

Emotional counseling, legal counseling, and advocacy are offered by virtually all shelter and nonshelter projects. The type of counseling varies from conversations with trained peer counselors to the services of consulting psychiatrists, and may include individual, group, and child counseling. Some centers offer counseling to battering men, either individually or in groups, and a few provide counseling for couples. If long-term therapy is needed, the woman will be referred to other agencies. Some centers also offer alcohol and drug abuse treatment.

Legal counseling can range from basic information and legal aid referral to the services of a staff attorney. If the woman decides to take action in civil court, to press criminal charges, or to get a divorce, the center will provide advice and support.

Center staff may also offer to arrange transportation or to accompany the battered woman to the hospital, police station, district attorney's office, or court. The center advocate will give information and support throughout the process and will work to ensure that agencies follow correct procedures. Advocates may also help the battered woman deal with related social services such as welfare and housing agencies; and many centers can provide referrals to educational programs, job training, and career counseling services.

The shelter is a vital component of battered women's programs. It allows the woman to get away from the abuser and to live in a supportive atmosphere where she can take time to decide what to do. The setting may be a house, a YWCA, a wing of a women's center, or other residential space; anywhere from two to sixty women may be accommodated in private bedrooms or in a dormitory setting. The length of stay permitted varies from one or two days to three months. Usually children below a certain age may stay with their mother; when this is not possible, the shelter will help find other housing and care for them. Some shelters are free, whereas others have very minimal or sliding-scale fees. House cleaning is generally done cooperatively; food may be bought and prepared cooperatively or individually. Curfews and rules about visitors vary from shelter to shelter. Some shelters maintain a confidential address for security reasons and require residents to respect this confidentiality. All counseling and advocacy services are offered at the shelter either by resident staff or visiting professionals, and many shelters make counseling a mandatory part of residency.

In addition to helping victims, battered women's centers may also educate the police, hospital staff, prosecutors, judges, and the public about the problems battered women face.

Career Counseling Services

Most of the centers in this section are members of the Catalyst National Network of Resource Centers; Catalyst is a national center on women and careers. Although not all of the centers listed serve women exclusively, all have a commitment to meeting women's special needs. Some of the centers offer programs for displaced homemakers; see the following section, "Displaced Homemaker Programs," for a description of these services. Women's centers that offer career counseling are not listed in the "Career Counseling Services" category; always call the local women's center as an additional resource.

The services listed here include profit and nonprofit independent organizations, college and university programs, YWCA services, and individual counselors. Executive search firms are not included. The centers serve women of all ages, educational backgrounds, job levels, and career interests, although college centers are obviously geared more toward women who attend, have attended, or want to attend college.

Some centers are free, some charge fees for certain services, some charge for all services, and some base their fees on a sliding scale. Fees for services usually range from $10 to $50 per hour for one-to-one counseling, $5 to $15 per hour for courses and workshops, and $75 to $150 for full-scale skill and aptitude testing. Independent organizations and counselors are more likely than college-based programs to charge for services. Most centers require an appointment for individual counseling, although resource materials are usually available on a drop-in basis. Some centers keep evening and weekend hours.

Career information and counseling can be provided in several ways: one-to-one counseling; workshops, seminars, and courses; discussion groups; and self-help through the use of resource materials. All methods will guide the job seeker through the same basic steps.

If a woman is undecided about her career or wants to change careers, the center will offer a variety of tests to assess her skills, aptitudes, interests, and values. The center will then guide the woman in finding the career areas that match her interests and abilities and in researching the occupational prospects in those areas.

If further education is needed for a woman to start or advance in a career, the center will help her select and apply to an educational program and locate financial aid if necessary. Some centers offer classes in basic math and writing skills, and college centers can advise women on the appropriate courses for particular career goals. If job training is needed, the center can make referrals to local programs. Career counselors can help the woman make long-range plans and determine what work experience she needs to reach her career objectives.

Teaching job seekers how to find employment openings is a crucial part of career counseling. Support groups and assertiveness training may be a part of this step. The center will help the woman prepare a resume and will explain job interview techniques.

Some centers provide job placement services for full-time, part-time, or temporary work. The placement fee, which is approximately 10 percent of a year's salary, is usually paid by the employer; if not, the woman who has accepted a position found through the center either pays the fee herself or arranges to split it with her employer.

Career counseling centers may also provide help with problems on the job such as time management, working with superiors, or sexual harassment. Some centers sponsor ongoing groups of women in particular professions or networking groups for women in all fields.

Some have programs for women who want to start their own businesses.

Along with services to individual women, many centers also provide consulting services to employers on issues and problems concerning women and work.

Displaced Homemaker Programs

The majority of programs in this category belong to the Displaced Homemakers Network; many others were identified through a listing compiled by the Education Development Center in Newton, Massachusetts. All displaced homemaker programs have been included, regardless of affiliation, since all serve women exclusively and most have all-women staff. Displaced homemaker programs that are affiliated with career counseling services or with women's centers are not listed in the "Displaced Homemaker Programs" category. Always call career counseling services and women's centers in your area for additional programs.

A displaced homemaker is a woman in her middle years who has been a homemaker for a substantial number of years but has lost her source of financial support through divorce, separation, widowhood, disability of spouse, or loss of Aid to Families with Dependent Children benefits. She needs a job but lacks the recognized skills, education, or training to find one on her own. She may need a variety of other support services. Starting in 1974, hundreds of displaced homemaker programs have been developed to help women such as these make the transition from homemaker to wage earner.

Displaced homemaker programs are usually affiliated with a college or university, career counseling center, YWCA, or women's center. The staff may range from five to twenty paid and volunteer workers, many of whom were displaced homemakers themselves. Almost all centers have a four-to-eight week core training program, plus workshops and counseling for women not enrolled in the formal program. Some services may be offered on a drop-in basis. Some services are free.

The displaced homemaker's first need probably will be for emotional counseling and support to help her come to terms with a radically altered life situation. The center will offer both individual counseling and group sessions with other displaced homemakers to help her gain confidence and make the necessary adjustments to her new situation. Telephone counseling may also be available.

Career counseling and placement are the core of all displaced homemaker programs. Most of the services offered are the same as those described in the preceding section on career counseling, but with specific attention to the special needs of women who have been homemakers most of their lives. Since many displaced homemakers have never worked outside the home, the program provides basic information on what they can expect when they enter the job market. The program emphasizes "job readiness"—preparation for the unfamiliar demands and responsibilities of full-time employment. Although the displaced homemaker may feel she must take the first position offered her, the center will encourage her to think in terms of a career not just a job. The guidance offered in resume preparation will help the woman to identify and present skills learned through homemaking and volunteer work.

If a woman needs further education, the center will offer courses or will help her find an appropriate educational program. Tuition aid may be available from the center. Work experience is also a key part of most programs; paid or volunteer internships may be available either at the center or with outside companies, and apprenticeships also may be arranged.

Displaced homemaker programs also offer a range of other services to help the former homemaker become independent. They may provide financial counseling on such matters as budget management and bank accounts, and they may help her explore ways to support herself until she is working. (Some centers provide emergency loans.) Assistance with housing problems and legal counseling concerning divorce or property may be available. Workshops may be offered on diverse subjects ranging from menopause and sexuality to home maintenance and auto repair.

Frequently, centers are involved in educating employers and the public on the needs and resources of displaced homemakers.

Planned Parenthood Clinics

The Planned Parenthood Federation of America is a national reproductive health care association with affiliates in almost every state. Although not women-run, Planned Parenthood clinics advocate women's control over their reproductive options, and in many regions, Planned Parenthood is the only low-cost abortion and reproductive health service available. The Planned Parenthood clinics listed in this directory include all certified affiliates. Many affiliates have additional branches, so call the regional affiliate to find the most conveniently located clinic.

The staff of each Planned Parenthood clinic includes at least one medical doctor and a variety of other health professionals, including nurses, nurse practitioners, nurse-midwives, social workers, and counselors. An appointment is needed to obtain most services, although some are provided on a walk-in basis. Most clinics are open weekend and evening hours in addition to weekdays. The fees charged vary widely among clinics, but all have arrangements such as sliding scale fees or deferred payment plans for women in financial need.

The primary work of Planned Parenthood clinics is to dispense birth control information and contraceptives. The prescription birth control methods available include oral contraceptives, the IUD, and the diaphragm; information on nonprescription methods is also provided. Birth control counseling is available for the woman who needs help in deciding which method is best for her. Some clinics perform vasectomies for men and a few offer voluntary sterilization services to women. About 20 percent of Planned Parenthood affiliates perform abortions; others can provide counseling and referrals to abortion clinics. Other Planned Parenthood services include testing and treatment for venereal disease, infertility, and minor vaginal problems; pregnancy testing; pap smears; and breast exams.

In addition to medical services, Planned Parenthood clinics offer information and counseling on sexual issues, teen discussion groups, and parent involvement programs. A few clinics offer prenatal care. Most clinics also conduct training sessions for social service workers, health workers, and teachers.

Planned Parenthood is a strong advocate for reproductive choice issues, and is engaged in lobbying and comprehensive public education on this subject.

Skilled Trades Training Centers

All of the organizations in this category provide services exclusively to women. The Recruitment and Training Program does serve both women and men (see page 176), but only those outreach offices with separate Women's Divisions have been included in this directory. Programs offered by career counseling services are not listed here, so check the "Career Counseling Services" category for additional resources.

Skilled trades training centers for women were created to help women enter the well-paid skilled and semi-skilled trades and crafts traditionally reserved for men: painter, plumber, carpenter, electrician, ironworker, steamfitter, bricklayer, sheetmetal worker, draftsperson, and many others. The center prepares the trainee to qualify for the highly competitive paid apprenticeships required by most trades and to be successful in the apprenticeship itself. In the semi-skilled fields, the center prepares the student to get a job or trainee position immediately.

Virtually all of the centers listed here are independent and are funded to provide free services. Most centers offer formal training and instruction programs lasting from approximately one to eight months, in addition to individual courses and workshops. Many provide the option of enrolling either full or part time; part-time programs and individual courses may be held in the evening. A high school degree or equivalency certificate is required for some programs, whereas others may demand only ninth-grade level education. Some centers serve low-income women exclusively.

The program begins with preliminary information on the different trades, the entrance requirements for each, the training process, and the outlook for apprenticeship and job openings. Through individual or group counseling, the center helps the student decide which field to enter. Where a training program is available, students learn the fundamentals of their chosen trades, including hands-on experience, classroom instruction, coaching for union exams, and often a physical conditioning program. Some centers provide a stipend during the training period. Programs that do not offer hands-on training will prepare students to take the union exam through classes or tutoring in math, mechanical reasoning, spatial relationships, test-taking skills, and interview techniques. After the training or tutoring program is completed, the center will help place the student in an apprenticeship program, training program, or entry-level job, depending on what is appropriate for her field. Many centers also provide support and assistance with problems on the job or apprenticeship.

Training centers also work with employers, unions, and career counselors to increase the number and status of women in nontraditional jobs.

Women's Centers

Women's centers emerged during the early 1970's in communities across the country to serve as focal points for feminist activities and to provide services for women as an alternative or supplement to those offered by traditional agencies. A women's center is an organization of women for women that provides information on women's issues, makes referrals to local women's organizations and services, and maintains a small library or resource collection. Although these are the core functions, almost all centers provide other services as well. In fact, many of the programs listed in this directory, particularly battered women and rape victim services, career counseling, and displaced homemaker programs, are also offered by women's centers. The local women's center should always be contacted in addition to or in the absence of a listing for the particular service needed. Women's centers that have shelters or safe-home networks for battered women are indicated by an "S" after the title.

Women's centers can be independent or part of a college or university, a YWCA, or—rarely—a multi-service community agency. The majority of centers have at least one paid staff member, although all centers depend on volunteers. The hours are sometimes restricted by the size of the staff; campus-based centers may have limited hours during the summer and other school vacations. Almost all centers, however, are open some evening and weekend hours. Fees vary depending on the finances of each center, but services and programs are generally low-cost, free, or offered on a sliding scale. Some services, especially counseling, are likely to be provided on a drop-in basis; but it is always best to call in advance. Many centers have some kind of common area or coffee house where women can meet.

Although the women's centers listed here are open to all women, women not enrolled in a college may be better served by a community-based than by a campus-based center. Campus-based centers, particularly in community colleges, are generally oriented toward women's career and educational needs.

Beyond the core functions of information and referral, women's centers also provide a wide variety of other services and programs. The services offered most often include career counseling; battered women and rape victim services; personal counseling; consciousness-raising groups; support groups for divorced women, mothers, and lesbians; assertiveness training; poetry readings; film and video festivals; and coordinated political activities. Less prevalent but still common are services for displaced homemakers; support groups for adolescents, substance abusers, older women, widows, singles, the physically challenged, women of color, and others; study groups on a wide range of women's issues; self-defense classes; dances; lectures; and conferences. Some centers have newsletters, and a few have published community resource directories. Many other services may be offered, depending on the needs and resources of women in the community.

Women's Commissions

Women's Commissions are agencies of state, county, or city governments appointed by the local or state administration to act as advocates for women's issues, both within the governments they serve and in the public sector. Most commissions support women's rights issues; some may be non-committal or, occasionally, opposed to feminist positions, depending on the views of the administration that appointed them.

Commissions generally consist of an advisory board appointed by the governor, mayor, or other elected official, and a small staff. Some commissions, particularly those in small cities and counties, do not have an office or paid staff. The main functions of women's commissions are research and advocacy rather than direct service to individuals, but most commissions do provide such services to some degree. Since commissions are not organized primarily to provide direct services to women, it is advisable to call or write rather than to drop in. Commission offices are open during normal business hours, and all services are free with the possible exception of special programs and conferences.

The services women's commissions do provide include information on women's issues, referrals to women's organizations and programs, particularly to appropriate government agencies, and a library. Commissions are especially useful for information on women's legal rights in their states or locales, and they often act as advocates within the government bureaucracy for women with sex discrimination complaints. Almost all commissions maintain a talent bank of resumes of women to recommend for political appointments. In addition, many commissions offer seminars, workshops, and conferences on women's issues, and some sponsor separate, ongoing programs such as career counseling centers or battered women's shelters. Most commissions also publish low-cost or free pamphlets and fact sheets, community resource directories, and newsletters.

Besides services to individual women, commissions conduct studies, work on legislation, consult with other government agencies, and advise the elected official they were appointed to serve. They may also facilitate cooperation among local women's groups and provide them with technical assistance.

Women's Health Centers

The women's health centers in this section are all owned and controlled by women. Feminist health care providers share the philosophy that women can and should be informed about their bodies and about basic medical procedures; they expect women to take an active role in their own health care.

Most of the centers listed here are independent; a few are affiliated with other health clinics and a few serve mainly lesbians. The size and professional composition of the staff of health centers varies, and may include male physicians, particularly in places where there are few or no female physicians. There may be several staff doctors or only one or two on call; however, many procedures normally performed by a doctor are instead administered by registered physicians' assistants, nurse practitioners, or trained lay staff. Fees for services vary, but sliding-scale fees or other arrangements are usually possible for women in need. It is always best to call in advance for an appointment.

Most women's health centers offer standard reproductive health services, including testing and treatment for venereal disease, vaginal infections, and urinary tract infections; pap smears; birth control; first trimester abortions; pregnancy testing; and breast exams. In addition, centers often provide less traditional services such as menstrual extraction or screening for sickle cell anemia.

While the basic medical procedures used in women's health centers are the same as those practiced anywhere, there are important differences in the approach and attitude of the providers. Women's health centers emphasize patient education and participation. Self-examination of the cervix and breasts, often taught in groups, is encouraged. Women learn to recognize changes in their bodies and to treat themselves with natural remedies such as cranberry juice for cystitis. Other procedures, such as IUD insertion and even abortion, may be offered in a group setting for the educational value and support that a group provides. If a woman needs a service not provided by the center, she will be referred to other clinics or doctors in the community.

In addition to medical services, centers offer peer or professional counseling on birth control, sexuality, and pregnancy decisions, either at the center or by telephone. If a pregnant woman elects to have an abortion, the counselor will explain the procedure, offer supportive counseling, and, in some centers, stay with the woman during the abortion if she wishes. Other centers may provide general mental health counseling. Most centers conduct educational programs, study sessions, and discussion groups on subjects such as sexuality menstruation, menopause, and the politics of health care.

Women's health centers are also involved in lobbying and public education on women's health issues.

SOURCES OF FURTHER INFORMATION

Each of the organizations listed in the preceding pages was selected because it offers women in need a special service. As a group, these agencies form an alternative social service network that has developed in response to the special needs of women not met by traditional agencies. Because they are alternative, however, they are more vulnerable than mainstream services: their budgets are small, their funding is insecure, and their staff often works on a volunteer basis. By the time you use Women Helping Women, you may find that the particular organization you are searching for is no longer in existence. By the same token, there will be new services that were created after this directory was published. The purpose of this section is to help you keep up with the inevitable change in services.

Organizational Resources

The first piece of advice, and one that has been repeated throughout these pages, is call your local women's center. If a service listed here has closed its doors or if a new one has opened, the women's center should have that information or may offer the service itself. Women's centers offer a wide and changing array of programs and services (see pages xx-xxi for a full description) so they should always be your first contact.

What if no women's center is listed in your area? To find out if a new center has opened, call the Women's Action Alliance directly; the Women's Action Alliance has the most comprehensive and up-to-date information on women's centers and can provide the name and address over the telephone. You can also write the Alliance for a complete national listing of women's centers (see below for telephone number and address).

Often, important services are offered by local chapters of the YWCA. Many YWCA's house women's centers, but even those that don't maintain a separate center usually provide the same basic services, especially information and referral. Therefore, it is always advisable to call the YWCA if you can't locate a women's center or if the center cannot be of help.

With the exception of women's centers and skilled trades training centers, each of the categories of service listed in Women Helping Women has a national association or coalition to which the local centers belong. Because they maintain accurate membership lists, these associations are sources of up-dated information. In addition, there are government offices, research centers, or other women's organizations and networks which also can provide the names and addresses of services. If the women's center or YWCA can't be of help, call or write the appropriate organization listed below.

Additional Resources for Individual Readers

If these resources fail to provide the service you need, you will have to rely on standard community sources. Your public library, for example, is likely to have a local information and referral center that can direct you to available services. Is there a branch of the United Way in your city or county? It is often able to provide access to local agencies. Every state in the country has a department of social services that can guide you. The names will vary—it may be a department, a bureau, or a division of social services, human resources, or health and welfare—but you will be able to make contact through the general information number in your state government. And don't forget the telephone directory. Many women who call the Women's Action Alliance found the number by looking in the white pages under "women." In the yellow pages, look under "social" or "human service organizations." The following are more specific suggestions for additional resources in the various service areas.

Violence-Related Services. Battering and rape are both crimes and therefore you might want to contact your local police department. Many police departments now have all-female units to deal with sex crimes, so be sure to ask. In any case, it's wise to have a friend—or a lawyer—accompany you to give support and act as an advocate. Your local Legal Aid Society may be able to provide information or legal advice. Some hospitals, too, have special care facilities for the victims of rape or battering. Another possibility for help is the victim assistance program that is becoming a more common feature of city crime services. If you have been battered and are seeking shelter, you should contact the YWCA. You might also consider contacting the Red Cross or the Salvation Army; both have expanded their services in recent years to meet new demands. Finally, your city or county government may provide emergency shelter.

Employment Services. If you are looking for your first job, trying to change careers, or re-entering the labor market after many years at home, there are several community agencies that can help. Many community and junior colleges have developed special women's programs in response to increasing demands. The continuing education division of your state university is sure to have some services for women. In addition to city or state employment services, your local government may have "manpower" [sic]programs that offer counseling or training. Finally, you might check the yellow pages of your telephone directory, look under "vocational guidance," "employment agencies," or other appropriate headings.

Health Services. Most gynecological services are, of course, available through private doctors or clinics. If you are seeking special services, such as abortion or low-cost care, however, you may encounter difficulties. Many hospitals have family planning clinics with low-cost or sliding scale fees. Your hospital or clinic may have a nurse practitioner program, a relatively new medical specialty, for routine gynecological matters. The nurse practitioner, while not able to provide all the services of a gynecologist, does have more authority than a nurse and a visit with her will cost less than one with a doctor. In addition, you may find the nurse practitioner more able and willing to take the extra time required to answer your questions fully and allay any anxieties. Again, check the yellow pages of your local telephone directory; look under "birth control" or "clinics."
